Background: Learning Audience Market Research

The Global Partnership aims to leverage the expertise and resources of our diverse network of partners to increase data for development knowledge and skills for public sector stakeholders, and others, to more effectively address development challenges. To increase reach and scale learning impact, we aim to supplement our hands-on offers with easily accessible, engaging, self-serve content by curating and aggregating learning materials from across our partners.

Key to the success of the self-serve learning offer is ensuring that the materials are being made available in the most relevant way possible. To do this, we need to understand how our target audience wants to and will most sustainably access learning content. While there are many repositories of data learning content currently available, they are often segmented by sector or type of data and it is not clear to what degree the content is being accessed and used by target audiences. Some of the key questions this research will address are: To what extent does our target audience actively use digital learning resources? What types of digital spaces does our audience actively engage with that would be fit-for-purpose? What determines continued access and use of learning materials for our audience? Which learner personas exist within our target audience and what are their preferred formats, media and languages for learning experiences? What motivates content providers to open up their resources to be made available in aggregated spaces?

This piece of research will seek to understand how our target audience prefers to access digital or self-serve learning products, the existing landscape of data for development learning hubs and their payment/funding/sponsorship models, and options for digital spaces that are fit-for-purpose. The findings from this research will inform the scope and direction of the Global Partnership’s digital learning offer.
